Law360 (July 12, 2022, 12:03 AM EDT) -- Crowell & Moring LLP has added an energy attorney who previously served as global chair of Squire Patton Boggs' energy and natural resources practice as a partner in Washington, D.C., the firm announced Tuesday.

Lisa Henneberry will work as part of Crowell & Moring's energy practice, where she will concentrate her own practice on assisting clients with developing, constructing and operating conventional and alternative energy projects, according to the firm.

Henneberry has particular experience with liquified natural gas projects worldwide, including serving as the lead project counsel for the first LNG terminal in Mexico, according to the firm. She also regularly works on managing natural gas and LNG disputes worldwide, assisting clients with negotiations and with formal dispute resolutions, according to Crowell & Moring.

Her practice is expected to intersect with Crowell & Moring's infrastructure group, as she works on guiding clients with their energy infrastructure projects from concept to completion, including any arbitrations that might arise, according to the firm.

Henneberry was drawn to Crowell & Moring because of its attorneys' experience handling energy-related transactions, regulations and dispute resolutions, along with how the firm looks to develop teams that can deliver a broad range of solutions to clients, she said in a statement Tuesday.

"The opportunity to collaborate with colleagues who are focused on getting clients the answers and the creative solutions they need to advance their business objectives is exciting," Henneberry said.

Henneberry received her undergraduate degree from Bryn Mawr College and her law degree from George Washington University Law School. She also serves as an independent director for Starfire Energy, a company that develops modular plants for producing carbon-free hydrogen and ammonia, according to the firm.

Crowell & Moring's attorneys work out of 12 locations in the United States, Europe, the Middle East and Asia.

"Lisa's experience is an asset to clients across the energy industry, particularly within the gas and power sectors," said Kirsten Nathanson, co-chair of Crowell & Moring's environment and natural resources group and its strategic growth committee, in a statement Tuesday. "She has a strong track record guiding conventional and renewable energy projects through their full life cycle and navigating the uncertainties of the current regulatory environment."
